

Intracellular edema (ballooning degeneration) results in an increase in the size of the spinous cells, associated with pallor of their cytoplasm. Severe intracellular edema results in rupture of the cell membranes and the formation of multiloculated intraepidermal vesicles (reticular degeneration).